

Sorin-Alexandru Vernea

History of Romanian Law

Editura
Stamangiu
2024

Chapter II

The Roman Province of Dacia

1. Roman Province of Dacia and its stages of organization

The conquest of Dacia by the Romans was possible after two military campaigns carried out by Emperor Trajan^[1] in the years 101-102 and 105-106 AD. At the end of the second war, Sarmizegetusa was conquered by the Roman legions, and the tragic death of King Decebal marked the end of the Geto-Dacian state^[2].

After two long and exhausting wars, part of the Dacian population perished, another part fled from the path of the Romans in today's northern Romania, and a large part remained in the conquered territory, being subjected to a new form of organization.

In 106 AD, Emperor Trajan turned Dacia into a Roman province, occupying only part of the original territory of Decebalus' state. Territorially, the province adjusted its borders during three organizations.

In the first stage, between 106-117 AD, the territories of Northern Transylvania (the historical provinces of Crişana and Maramureş), along with Northern Moldova, were not under Roman domination, being inhabited by free Dacians, refugees from the second Roman war.

^[1] Roman Emperor, at the helm of the Empire in the period 98-117 AD.

^[2] M. Guţan, op. cit., p. 15.

Southern Moldova and a large part of Muntenia's plain, along with the southeastern corner of Transylvania (the region between the Olt River and the Carpathian Mountains), were incorporated into the province of Moesia Inferior.

The remaining territory of Decebal's former state, namely Transylvania without the Northern part, and without the South-East corner, along with Banat and Oltenia were part of the unitary Province of Dacia Augusta.

The second stage started in 117 AD, the year of Emperor Trajan's death, when the free Dacians from the northern area, together with other conquered populations, tried to remove the Roman administration through repeated attacks. With a view to effective military organization, Emperor Hadrian^[1], divided the province into Dacia Superior, which included the territory of the unitary province, with the exception of Oltenia, and Dacia Inferior, which included the territory of Oltenia, the South-Eastern corner of Transylvania and part of Western Muntenia, the latter two originally being part of the province of Moesia Inferior.

Seven years later, in 124 AD, Emperor Hadrian decided to separate the territories north of the rivers Mureş and Arieş, forming the province of Dacia Porolissensis, a militarized zone, used for defense against attacks from the North.

The third stage began in 168 AD, and lasted until the Aurelian Retreat (271-275 AD). Emperor Marcus-Aurelius^[2] united Dacia Superior and Dacia Inferior, forming Dacia

^[1] The successor of Emperor Trajan, in charge of the Roman Empire in the period 117-138 AD.

^[2] Roman Emperor, at the helm of the empire between 161-180 AD.

Apulensis. In the year 169 AD Oltenia and part of western Muntenia were separated, forming Dacia Malvensis^[1]. Dacia Parolissensis remained within the known limits after the second stage of the organization. In this form, the Roman province preserved its borders until the Aurelian retreat.

2. Central governing bodies in the Roman Province of Dacia

Roman provinces, in the first stage of the Roman Empire, were divided into imperial and senatorial provinces. The classification was made according to their economic and military importance^[2].

Throughout its existence, Dacia was an imperial province, unpacified^[3], being placed under the administration of the Emperor, who was represented by a trustee, who performed the function of Governor.

2.1. Governor

He acted as a representative of the Emperor, bearing the title "legatus augusti". The terminology used shows that the governor was a deputy of the Emperor in the province, being an executor of the imperial policy. He was a Roman magistrate, which is why he had the right to publish an edict (jus edicendi) showing how he would fulfill his duties during the mandate^[1].

^[1] The location of Dacia Malvensis province is not unanimously accepted by historians. In one opinion it was estimated that it would have been located in the West of Banat (E. Cernea, E. Molcuț, op. cit., p. 24). In another opinion, it was shown that Dacia Malvensis included all of Oltenia (M. Bărbulescu, D. Deletant, K. Hitchins, Ș. Papacostea, P. Teodor, Istoria României, Corint Educațional Publishing, Bucharest, 2014, p. 49). We will consider the latter opinion, as it has been seen as most plausible in recent decades.

^[2] M. Guțan, op. cit., p. 17.

^[3] A.J. Andrei, Istoria statului și a dreptului ... (I), op. cit., p. 50.

In the unitary province of Dacia Augusta, the governor was called "legatus augusti pro praetore", he was recruited from the senatorial order^[2] and had consular rank^[3]. In terms of military attributions, the governor of consular rank could command several Roman legions, and in terms of administrative and judicial attributions, he had full powers. His prerogatives came from "imperium pro consulare" – terminology that designates the attributions and power of the Roman consul.

The capital of the province and the governor's residence were located in Colonia Ulpia Traiana Augusta Dacica Sarmizegetusa.

In the province of Dacia Superior, the governor continued to bear the title of "legatus augusti pro praetore", he was recruited from the senatorial order, but had the rank of praetor^[4]. This title grants the right to command a single Roman legion. The governor had administrative powers, and

^[1] C.I. Murzea, R. Matefi, op. cit., p. 15.

^[2] It designates the social category of Roman aristocrats, respectively members of the Senate and their descendants.

^[3] He had previously served as consul in Rome.

^[4] He had previously served as praetor in Rome. The importance of the praetor, as a Roman magistrate, was inferior to the importance of the consul, who held the highest magistracy that emerged during the Roman Republic (509 BC - 27 BC). During the time of the Principate (27 BC - 284 AD), the republican magistrates lost their importance, but continued to exist.

judicially he was entitled to decide on the application of the death penalty.

The provincial capital remained in Colonia Ulpia Traiana, but the governor's residence was moved to Apulum, where a Roman legion was stationed.

In the province of Dacia Inferior, the governor held the title of "procurator augusti" and came from the equestrian order^[1]. His competences in administrative matters were inferior to those exercised by "legatus augusti", and in military matters, the governor did not have the right to command Roman legions.

Both the provincial capital and the governor's residence were located in the town of Drobeta.

In the province of Dacia Porolissensis, initially, the management belonged to a "procurator augusti", but later, after the stationing of legion V Macedonica in the fortress of Porolissum, the management of the province was taken over by the commander of this legion. Appointing a military commander as head of the administration was due to the province's role in enabling effective defense against attacks from the north. Therefore, Dacia Porolissensis was more important from a military, perspective, rather than a social or economic one.

The capital of the province was initially in the city of Porolissum, but the governor's residence alternated between Porolissum and Napoca.

In Dacia Apulensis, the governor held the title of "legatus augusti pro praetore Daciae Trium" (of the three Dacias), came from the senatorial order and had consular rank, the province regaining its importance from the time of ^[1] Specific to the social category of knights, known in ancient Rome.

Emperor Trajan. The governor exercised duties of coordinating the activity in all three provinces.

Colonia Ulpia Traiana acquired the title of "Metropolis Daciarum Trium", being one of the most important cities of the Roman Empire. The governor's residence was established at Apulum.

Dacia Malvensis was led by a "procurator augusti", originating from the equestrian order. Since governing the province of Dacia Malvensis was achieved through the centralization of power by the governor of Dacia Apulensis, the remaining attributions were restricted and predominantly of light administrative nature.

Both the provincial capital and the governor's residence were located in the town of Malva.

2.2. Concilium Provinciae Daciarum Trium

It was a consultative organism, composed of representatives from every city of the province. We know that it appeared in the third stage of organization, during the reign of Emperor Marcus-Aurelius.

Its duties concerned all areas of life in the provinces; however, the Council could not take concrete measures. While exercising its functions, it had two possibilities: either approve the measures of the provincial administration, or make complaints against them, to the Emperor^[1].

The main task was to maintain the imperial cult and the cult of Rome as a means of strengthening social cohesion, loyalty and devotion to the Roman leadership.

It met annually in the Augustals Palace situated in Colonia Ulpia Traiana Sarmizegetusa, and the assembly was presided over by the leader of the Augustals, called "Sacerdos arae augusti".

^[1] E. Cernea, E. Molcuț, op. cit., p. 25.

3. Financial organization in the Roman Province of Dacia

It was led by a financial procurator based in Colonia Ulpia Traiana.

In Dacia Augusta, in Dacia Superior and Dacia Apulensis the financial procurator was recruited from the equestrian order and was directly subordinated to the governor. Along with the financial procurator there were officials with specific duties, called "tabulari" (accountants in charge of calculating taxes), "librarii" (recorders) and "dispensatores" (cashiers).

In Dacia Inferior and Dacia Malvenis, the duties of the financial procurator were exercised by the governor, respectively by "procurator augusti". The situation was the same, initially, in Dacia Porolissensis. Later, after the government of the province was taken over by the commander of Legion V Macedonica, its financial organization was attributed to a special financial procurator, who had inferior powers to a governor from the equestrian order.

We know that in each province taxes were divided in three categories:

- (i) Direct taxes, called tributum: the tax on land (tributum soli or stipendium) and the tax on the head of the inhabitant (tributum capitis);
- (ii) Indirect taxes, called vectiglia: for receiving an inheritance or freeing a slave – 5% of the value; for the sale of a slave – 4% of the value; for the sale of goods – 1% of the value;

- (iii) Customs duties, called portoria: levied by a customs procurator for the movement of goods and people – 2,5% on the value of goods. They were charged both when crossing the borders of the province and when entering certain cities^[1]. These were initially collected by a tenant of the customs service (called conductor), but, after the province's third stage of organization, they were collected by members of the equestrian order^[2]. Customs offices were organized on the territory of Dacia, both at the borders and inside the province. These were run by public slaves (called servi villici)^[3]. Dacia, along with Moesia Superior and Moesia Inferior, made up the customs district of Illyricum^[4].

4. Military organization of the Roman Province of Dacia

Dacia was, throughout its existence, an unpacified province. Although several Roman legions passed through its territory, only four were stationed.

^[1] D. Țop, O. Mastacan, op. cit., p. 24.

^[2] E. Cernea, E. Molcuț, op. cit., p. 26.

^[3] The public slaves came, as a rule, from among the populations conquered by the Romans. These were people with a high level of qualification in their country of origin, to whom the Romans offered the opportunity to work in the interest of the state. If they refused, they could be sold in the slave markets as war pray. Unlike ordinary slaves who, according to Roman law, could not own property, public slaves were paid, could acquire property, even other slaves. They had an intermediate status between a free man and a slave.

^[4] E. Cernea, E. Molcuț, op. cit., p. 26.